

Should I use accounting software?

Accounting software is supposed to be like an egg slicer – a tool that makes it easier to do something you have to do anyway.

But accounting software isn't like Microsoft Word or Excel – where all you have to do is open a document and start entering information.

Accounting software requires you to answer dozens of questions – and execute your answers the way the software requires – before you can start using it.

Do you want to do this yourself? After all, the software says it's easy. My guess is that you'll try, but soon realize you're in over your head and start looking for someone who has done this before. But who?

Your tax advisor? This can get really expensive.

A bookkeeper? How many times has this bookkeeper set up this accounting software? – for companies in your industry?

In reality, accounting software is a monster to set up.

It is not like an egg slicer.

But that's OK – you don't need accounting software.
